

A Mental Pyramid Scheme

Yunessa Rodríguez

A distraction is an understatement. This design embodies a literal hell for a person struggling with attention and obsessive compulsive disorders. Imagine someone trapped you in this setting, but told you that somewhere in this mess, there is a key. The panic eats you alive as you travel further and further down this pyramid, until you reach the end of the rope that taunts you to let go. Imagine this, but the key is sanity and the trap is your own brain.

Grooved Pillars
- Repetitively used to stimulate pattern recognition.

-OCD & Patterns
= comfort

A- Ladders

- Represents every large step away from a goal, hence, the route to each level.

B- Shelves

- These empty shelves indicate a lack of clarity. When no surface information is present, we find ourselves searching in useless boxes.

C- Blocked Tunnels

- After traveling this far, there is hope of light at the end of the tunnel, however, these tunnels were never made to be traveled through.

Locked Doors

- When attempting to open a door and it's locked, chances are that at least one door isn't. Not here though, they're all locked. The first trap involves the anxiety fueled practice of "checking." An endless cycle of reviewing pointless material just to "make sure".

The Rope

- Nowhere. The rope leads nowhere. While on the hunt for "something," there was nothing. With these wasted hours weighing on you at the bottom of this rope, is the heavier weight of knowing how much more it will take for you to climb out.

The Clock

- At the end of this pyramid is a clock. This symbolizes the moment of realization and panic as it becomes apparent how much time has been wasted on a meaningless journey. At this point you can still leave up the ladders, or since all this time has already been wasted, you can see what the bottom of the rope holds...

